Celebrating 30 years of VAWA

Safety & Justice for Immigrant Survivors of Violence

The problem: Immigrant victims of domestic abuse and sexual assault in the U.S. face unimaginable barriers to safety and justice. Unsure if it is safe to go to an emergency room or shelter, request a restraining order, or dial 911, they often fear that reporting the abuse will result in deportation. Rapists, abusers, and other predators exploit this vulnerability, targeting those who are far from home, unfamiliar with the U.S., and terrified of separation from their families. ASISTA leads the fight to ensure that these survivors can access safety and justice. We are staunch defenders of immigrant victims' rights, supporting the on-the-ground advocates and lawyers who represent them.

How ASISTA makes a difference: Combining legal and policy savvy with creative alliances and movement-building, we: Provide expert training, resources, & individualized case consultation to attorneys and advocates, to help their survivor clients' cases succeed in court • Serve as a liaison and intervene with our government contacts to stop survivors from being unfairly deported • Push back on harmful policies that endanger immigrant victims, advise the field on how to mitigate the harm, and advance policies instead that provide safety and justice • Arm attorneys and advocates with cutting-edge strategies to address the latest developments affecting immigrant survivors, and • Develop and support litigation campaigns to fight government practices that unjustly deport victims.

This year marks the 30-year anniversary of when ASISTA's founders helped write the immigration provisions of the federal Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) (and later, the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Prevention Act, or TVPA), affording legal status to hundreds of thousands of survivors and their children. Today, we continue these efforts to advance federal legislation such as the WISE Act, all to ensure that immigrant women and families suffering violence may seek safety and justice without fear of deportation. We urge you to join us.

THE BRIGHT HORIZONS CAMPAIGN

Immigrant survivors and their children deserve to live in safety and dignity. ASISTA's 2024 Bright Horizons Spring Campaign reflects our determination that together, we can make that vision a reality. In recent years, challenges have proliferated for immigrant survivors of violence and their advocates. Today, we look to the future with a renewed commitment to ensuring that rights and protections for survivors will be not only safeguarded, but enhanced in the coming days. We cannot do this work without our allies: your support is critical to our success. We welcome you to join us in reaching those Bright Horizons.
